Where, indeed, is the Barber of any age or country against whom an imputation can be justly levelled? He is one of the fine arts which pre-eminently "emollit mores, nec sinit esse foros." As iron, by attrition with the magnet, obtains some of its power of attraction, so does he, by always associating with his superiors, acquire a portion of their polish and urbanity. Shoemakers, tailors, and oth er artisans of lonely and sedentary life, are generally melancholy, artrabilarious, subject to religious hypochrondriaism; but the patron of the bluff is comotive and social in his habits, buoyant, brisk, and hillarious in his temperament. There is not, perhaps. a single instance of a fanatic barber; and how many traits are recorded of their generous forbearance. Alfieri was so nervously sensitive, that if one hair was pulled a little tighter than the rest, he would fly into a paroxism of rage, draw his sword, and threaten to destroy the offender; yet such was his confidence, that he would the next moment submit his throat to his razor. How calm and dignified was the reply of one of this class to the pimple-faced madman, who with a loaded pistol in his dy!" hand, compelled him to take off his beard, declaring that if he cut him in a single place, he would inmy mind to cut your throat!'-Horace Smith's Grav-
